Diagnosing oral cancer: can Toluidine Blue mouthwash help?

Following our visit about oral cancer in professions of FDI World, Prof Norrill Johnson and colleagues explain the use of a product designed to aid detection of oral cancer.

Oral cancer is the sixth most common malignancy worldwide. It remains a highly lethal and certainly disfiguring disease. The prevention and early diagnosis of oral cancer lies mainly in the hands of the primary dental care professions. Whilst approaches to prevention include guidance on avoidance of dangerous habits (notably tobacco and alcohol), on adequate nutrition and on adequate oral and personal hygiene, dentists are important in secondary prevention through opportunistic screening and planned screening of populations at high risk.

Using a detecting solution

So how can dentists be helped in this process? Thorough visual and digital examination of all the oral soft tissues, along with careful examination of the head, neck and cervical lymph nodes, followed by biopsy of suspicious areas, remains the mainstay of diagnosis. However, a method that is now gaining widespread attention is the adjunctive use of a solution of Toluidine Blue, which stains cancerous lesions a dark blue, thus distinguishing it from the rest of the oral mucosa. Although it has been used for many years for cancer detection at several body sites, including the mouth, it is now being marketed commercially around the world in the form of a mouthrinse under various trade names, such as 'Orascan', 'Orascreen' or 'Oratest'. The FDI is producing a position statement on the use of this product, which will be published in a later issue of FDI World, but this article will give an overview of its use.

How useful is Toluidine Blue?

There have been a number of clinical trials using Toluidine Blue, the results of which are presented in Table 1.

Looking at these results, we can see that Toluidine Blue has good sensitivity i.e. that it is sensitive to the presence of oral carcinoma, and also that it has a very low overall false negative rate, i.e. a very low number of oral cancers are not stained by the solution.

It has also been found to be useful for delineating the appropriate site for biopsies with a greater degree of accuracy than clinical judgement alone.

Specificity of Toluidine Blue

Some studies show low specificity, that is, how many other types of lesion are stained in addition to oral carcinoma. Although the

Coronary heart disease, Helicobacter pylori, dental disease, Chlamydia pneumoniae, and cytomegalovirus: Meta-analyses of prospective studies

John Danesh, MBChB, MSc Oxford, UK

A number of reviews have been published on associations between coronary heart disease (CHD) and various persistent bacterial or viral agents or between CHD and clinical conditions, such as dental disease, which may be associated with persistent infection.¹⁻³ These studies have yielded conflicting results, so there is now substantial uncertainty about the existence of real epidemiological associations between CHD and any persistent infective agent. For several methodological reasons, however, restriction of attention to just the published prospective studies should help to clarify the actual evidence.⁴ First, studies in which CHD events have been recorded some years after "baseline" measurements (eg, blood collection) should be less prone to selection biases than retrospective studies because, in such prospective studies, cases are compared with "internal controls" nested the presence of H pylori, C pneumoniae, cytomegalovirus, or dental infection were sought by computer-assisted searches, scanning of relevant reference lists, hand-searching of cardiology, epidemiology and other relevant journals, and discussions with relevant authors.⁶⁻²³ Combinations of key words were used in the computer searches, including H pylori, Campylobacter pylori, C pneumoniae, cytomegalovirus, dental infection, periodontal disease, missing teeth, coronary heart disease, myocardial infarction, and atherosclerosis. Studies were included that involved cases with myocardial infarction or CHD death, whereas studies were excluded that did not provide separate CHD results, such as studies of total vascular death.^{24,25} The following were abstracted: size and type of cohort (ie, population based or selected on the
